In regard to the option of prohibiting trains from blowing their whistles at certain crossings: I say a profound "NO!" I have lived by the tracks my entire life and have no complaint with the train blowing it's horn. It lets me know that it is there and to watch out for it. I will admit that sometimes an engineer will go overboard with his horn, but that is a rare occasion. The railroad tracks are right in front of my house and we are only two blocks from a major crossing. I can't for the life of me understand why people would complain about the horns blowing. If they don't like it, they can move. It isn't like they didn't know about it when they moved in. The tracks haven't moved any, so what is the problem? Please don't allow people to stop trains from blowing at crossings.

Sincerely, Cathryn J. Osborn
